the answer to a demand, and the demand for larger facilities for the intellectual training of girls is in many instances even stronger than the demand for similar training in boys. The thirst for knowledge is as keen in women as in men. The increased mental activity of the weaker sex is one of the most remarkable features in the course of what is called modern enlightenment; and the stronger the growth of literary tastes among women, the greater is the obligation laid upon society to supply the means of guiding those tastes aright.

Moreover, one of the strongest grounds for the multiplying of secondary schools lies in the influence of such schools in raising the mental tone of society. That influence is often a more powerful one in the hands of women than in those of men. For good or for evil, women are, in their sphere, the foremost of educators and the most potent of rulers; and the influence which society brings to females, especially during the period of what is known as school-girl age and young womanhood, is an influence which it must certainly get back again in one shape or another. Beyond this there is the further consideration that society has now come to regard the imparting of education as being as truly the work of women as of men. Either from taste or from necessity, a large number of women now devote their lives to teaching, and the community, instead of being the loser, is often the gainer thereby. It is evident that for a number of reasons a great deal of the secondary education of the future will have to be done by women, and it is of the utmost importance, therefore, that some suitable provision for the better education of boys should be made by a similar provision for the better education of girls.

The tardiness of society in adopting a more perfect machinery for this branch of higher education has not been confined to this part of the world. Within the last few years an English writer has said that "throughout the length and breadth of the British Empire one institution alone exists in which women can receive the higher form of systematic education. It is a startling fact in these days of loud educational talk; but less strange than when coupled with the facts that by the side of the 820 endowed schools which existed at the time of the School Inquiry Commission for boys, and their 36,874 scholars, there were only 113 schools for girls, numbering 1113 scholars, and that not one of these schools were of the highest grade."

It is satisfactory to find that the neglect of female education is now being remedied both in England and America. In America the system of mixed colleges has been tried, and it is said, with the most satisfactory results. In England the verdict of the authorities has not been in favour of either the education or the examination of the two sexes being carried on in the same institutions, and at the same time neither can it be said that the education of women has yet become a part of the regular work of the universities. It is, however, a work that is now being vigorously carried on under the shadow of the universities and by university professors. We are told that the demand for this branch of educational work increases, "till it has surpassed the supply."

Colleges are choked, and hundreds of first-class men are making livings by delivering very excellent and careful lectures to "young girls." In England there is at least one college which was founded to establish the fact of women's capacity to follow severe study, to raise the position of female teachers, and to introduce method into the chaos of girls' education. With every desire to do justice to the various institutions among us which have contributed to the making of our girls what it is, we must submit that it is much to be regretted that an institution which aims at as high a standard as Girton College, and is equally thorough and efficient in its training, does not exist in any one of these colonies.

Mr. WILKINSON'S speech was in such questionable taste as to take away from him individually the right of complaining of unseasonable interruptions; but others who are interested in Parliamentary proprieties retain that right in full force. Nothing could justify the style of Mr. WILKINSON'S interpolated remarks. They were utterly unbecoming to the purpose and to the atmosphere of the Legislative Assembly. Interruptions of this kind are justifiable when they tend promptly to correct mistakes, or are in any way distinctly pertinent to the purpose of the debate; but remarks that have no relevancy, which are simply personal insults, and which are directly calculated—if they are not intended to provoke a row, stand absolutely condemned. They are fit for a pot-house, they are not fit for the first Assembly in the land. The SPEAKER condemned these interruptions in the strongest possible way, and appealed to the House to notice his ruling. The House took no notice of his ruling. The question for the House, members at the beginning of a new session and a new Parliament, whether they are prepared to tolerate and to cultivate this style of Parliamentary discourse. New members especially, who are not responsible for any of the discredit attached to past Parliaments, but who will attach this Parliament, should especially set their faces against such conduct that damages the prestige of the Assembly. It is the duty of the people has elevated them. Debate must, and we have it through and searching; and we shall not complain if it gets warm. But simple bullying and blackguarding is not debate, and it is necessary that Parliament should have some effective power of restraining those who are given to these exhibitions. It would be quite legitimate if, when any member is repeatedly called to order, and still repeatedly disobeys, the House should exercise its power of excluding him from the debate for the remainder of the evening. This would not be any violation of freedom of speech, or of personal liberty, and would, in fact, be nothing more than like driving a dog off the racecourse, because he was interfering with the proceedings. If the object of the members meeting together was to get up a row, then interjections would be distinctly pertinent to the purpose of the meeting, but if the object was to discuss the principles that ought to guide the legislation of the country, then a volley of personal insults is simply so much distraction.

Assembly wish to see this style of thing introduced into the House. If the House, they should take prompt steps to stop it. The House has inherent power to conduct its own affairs, and to preserve order; or if there should be any doubt whatever as to the limits of its jurisdiction over its members, it can easily supply the deficiency by a short bill. The SPEAKER is put in the chair to keep order, but he cannot possibly keep order if his members will not mind what he says, and if when they are distinctly ruled out of order, they repeat the offence in a grosser fashion. The SPEAKER is the mouthpiece of the House, and if order is to be maintained, it must be through the SPEAKER, but by the strength of the House.

THE THEATRE AND OTHER AMUSEMENTS FOR TO-DAY.—The advertisements having reference to excursions, theatres, and other sources of amusement for to-day, will be found on page 16 of the present issue.

MOTION OF CENSURE.—The discussion of the motion proposed by Mr. Stuart on Wednesday—That the Government be censured for the manner in which the House was resumed in the Legislative Assembly yesterday. When Sir G. Wigram Allen took the chair there was a bare quorum present. Mr. Cameron and Mr. Hungerford being the only members on the Opposition side of the Chamber. From the outset of the adjourned debate it was known that there would be a large majority in favour of the Government, and the Government, instead of being the loser, is often the gainer thereby. It is evident that for a number of reasons a great deal of the secondary education of the future will have to be done by women, and it is of the utmost importance, therefore, that some suitable provision for the better education of boys should be made by a similar provision for the better education of girls.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE.—After the proposed vote of censure last night, the Government, with the consent of the House, went on with Supply, and an Appropriation Bill for the month of January was passed. The bill included a sum of £40,000 for railway workmen for the month of February, £7000 for workmen in the Harbours and Rivers Department, and £30,000 as an advance to the Treasurer.

TOLLS ON FERRIES.—We learn that the Government have determined to carry out the resolution of the Legislative Assembly last session, and have arranged to take off the tolls from all public ferries. Some of these tolls have already ceased, and the collection of the remainder will be discontinued within a day or two.

THE INTERPRET CABLE.—The British-Singapore cable is still interrupted. We have been unable to obtain any particulars as to the cause of the break, or as to the probable length of time the cable will take to be repaired.

"It would be fruitless, therefore, to extend the limit the year 1810, the earliest year in the statistics which we deal with, to the year 1800, as Madras has no statistics for that year. Hence 1811, 1824, 1832, 1848, 1869, 1877. These figures were caused by deficient rainfall in the years named, and the years 1810, 1824, 1832, and 1859. Now, five out of those six years of drought, within the three years' period of minimum rainfall, were the years of minimum rainfall. The years 1810 and 1859, were the years of the minimum group, and years mainly preceding the main minimum group, and years mainly that group. The famous flood resulting from the heavy preceeding year of 1860, was the year of minimum group.
